When I step up to bonded or partition bullets is when velocity is getting high and standard cup and cone bullets might not hold together on bone, have seen that before. Also the smaller the caliber of the cartridge and the faster you push a bullet the tougher I want the bullet to be. I will usually switch to bonded or partitions when the velocity is north of 2850fps impact velocity. I have seen a few cup and core bullets come apart and not penetrate well at that speed or more. I do really like the 129gr Nosler LRAB for deer from the little 6.5 Grendel, Bonded but expands very well even at long range to me and transfers a lot of energy at closer ranges yet exits. Those 129 ABLR are my favorite on game performance bullet in 6.5 CM, if you can get them to shoot. Texas Hunting Forum | Texas Fishing Forum| Louisiana Fishing Forum | Georgia Fishing Forum | Florida Fishing Forum That's a pretty stout load for a 168 VLD in a 280 AI that's shooting very well already, so that's hard to beat. The question is, would an animal know the difference between a 168 VLD and a 175 EOL? Probably not. In real world terms, probably no difference. But I like tinkering with stuff, so I generally try a new bullet out and see what results I get. I like shooting, doing load work ups, and going to the range to play with loads. Berger has a bunch of new EOL's coming out. As well as Hornady does with the their line of ELD bullets. Looking either one of these before I order one. Would prefer .357. Let me know what you might have. The smart Germans settled southeast of San Antonio, on good farmland. The ones that made it to Fbg, thought it looked "just like Bavaria" and released lots and lots of sheep on their pasture, that has about 1/2" of topsoil, got a nasty surprise the next spring. ...and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.
