Description: See You at The Top by Zig Ziglar Read the Text Version Thanks to my family for indulging me in my strongest-rooted compulsion so late in life. Their support means everything. Writing may be my life but Bryan, Steve, Mom, Grams, Tracey, Naomi, and Aaron are my world. Thanks to Kathryn Lynn Davis, my first reader, first writing teacher and steadfast friend. This book would not be what it is without the guidance and support of the UC Riverside Creative Writing faculty and staff-in particular, Susan Straight, Michael Jayme, and Goldberry Long. Susan has been there from the very beginning, her empathy and knowledge extending beyond the classroom. She taught me how the best characters must leave an indelible impression on the reader and what she's remembered about mine over the years has led me to understand them and the author I needed to become to tell their story. Michael's careful eye helped me stay true to the characters. I am so grateful for his time, thoughtfulness, and showing me how to stay sane while managing the dimensions of a long, complex writing project. He encouraged me to take risks, dig deep, and to expect more from myself. Goldberry showed me the importance of trusting my writer and teacher selves and how to be kind to them. She gave me the delicate art of literary negotiation and taught me to be fearless. I will never forget how much fun Pedagogy and Plotting over coffee can be and leaving that table feeling like I could really do this. So I have and will. Thank you. v To family who are friends and friends who are family Max. There it is again. But she only catches the end, the hissing of that last syllable, like a tendril of the past threading through space and time, looping round and under to tie a knot in her heart. In her worst nightmares-the ones she still has, in spite of his absence (or maybe because of it)-her brother perches on the red steel cliff, ready to dive no matter the cost. He looks over at her to make sure she's watching. She runs, desperate to stop him. But he changes. It isn't Max's face. It isn't anyone she knows. She holds out her hand. The phantom turns away, standing up, a body disproportionately tall, its head among the long red cables swinging from one beam to the next, outgrowing the bridge, outgrowing the world. She's calling his name, telling him to stop. But when he speaks, the voice isn't what she expects. It sounds young like Aidan, her son. She wakes up then in a sweat, freezing, and she reaches for Jack but he's not there. She's lost count of the number of spouses she's counseled over the years through divorce or death, spouses who have had similar nightmares. She initially started offering her counsel at Jack's request but ever since she took over their unit's Family Support Group, she's felt better. It lessened her long-standing need for a degree or a career, one that might actually evolve into a new life. She doesn't consider catering a career because it was a means to an end. A paycheck. A little bit to push them just over the poverty line in one of the world's most expensive cities where they live on an enlisted soldier's pay. Food was the great equalizer. Whether a birthday party, wedding or funeral, food had the power to transform people-to make reconnect them. Every family except hers. 4 Max. Even if it is a mistake, the voice has done its work. Suddenly she misses her brother with an intensity she hasn't allowed herself in a year. She considers the very real possibility of visiting him. Of telling Jack, she'd like to go up to see him, alone. Taking the opportunity to try it out-being on her own away from him. Starting small. Reconnecting with her brother. Three years of separation-and three thousand miles-is long enough. She feels much better at the thought, at the decision. Suddenly she can't wait for Jack to get back. Letter or not, she will go see her brother. She will make amends with him and get his input about her plans. He'll help her, support her. For once, she will need him instead of him needing her. The front door shuts. She stuffs the envelope back under the mattress. Beyond the foot of the bed, Jack parts the curtains with a swift slice of the hand. Just enough for streetlights to reach inside. He has on nothing but boxers too loose on his hips. She's surprised at how skinny he looks until he turns. His arms and legs fill in, all smooth muscle and thick bone. Even at forty-four he is still the boy she fell in love with when she was just twelve. There's still that. "Have you spoken to Max?" she asks. He moves to the small wooden chest at the foot of their bed, his face half-hidden in shadow from the streetlight. He turns to sit down on the chest, wadding up his shirt in one fist. The longer he waits to answer, the more anxious she becomes.
